It vests the succession to the presidency in the members of the cab-Inet, in the order in which they were named in Washington's original caldnet, beginning with the secretary of state and ending with the secretary of the interior, the latter officer having been added to the cabinet in 1849. The bill avoids the trouble of calling and holding a new election in case of a contingency that is possible tourise at any time, and provides for the continnance of the administration in accordance with the wishes of a majority of ous election. Thus, far in the history of this government the secretary of state has always been some conspicuous citizen and a member of the dominant party, and some who have filled that office have afterward become the president by popular election. This was the case with Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, John Quincy Adams, Van g his proposition to make the na- Buren and James Buchanan; and nearly all the other secretaries of state their friends for the presidential nomination in the national conventions. Henry Clay and Lewis Cass were made the respective candidates for their parties for the presidency, after serving as secretary of state; and Me-Lean, Webster, Calhono, Marcy, Seward and others were often urged as suitable persons to receive the distinguished honor. Another possible case of the contemplated emergency, the country would experience the turmoll of a change in the foreign and domestic policy of the government. litical party, but one who from the nawith the main features of the policy of the preceding administration. As the secretary of state is almost universally a man of pre-eminem ability, the conntry would not be apt to suffer on that score.
